To whom it may concern

It is my pleasure to write in support of Adrien Rougier's application for a full-time research and teaching assistant position in political sciences at the faculty of philosophy and social science of the Université Libre de Bruxelles.

Adrien is a very promising young researcher. I have known him for two years now, as instructor and as head of the Political Theory program at Sciences Po. He strikes me as a very bright, mature and hardworking person.

I continue to have close contact with Adrien, both in the seminars and workshops that are organized as part of our program and in individual settings, as I have read and advised him on his work frequently. I have come to rely on his enthusiasm and professional capabilities.

Adrien has all the usual characteristics of an excellent and promising young academic, the papers he writes are absolutely rigorous in their argumentation and he has designed for himself a research program rich in philosophy and the social sciences, providing him with a relevant and interdisciplinary foundation for bridging empirical and normative aspects. He has the ability to take responsibility for his own intellectual development, and is a real asset to seminar discussion. He has displayed great ability to pursue his own initiatives without constant guidance, which I regard as an essential quality.

His academical background is truly impressive. Adrien has an outstanding record in political philosophy and social sciences, providing him with a relevant and interdisciplinary foundation for ambitious sociological work. Besides studying in five of the most prestigious European universities, Adrien was also employed in various teaching positions: he is an extremely dynamic teacher, able to clearly explain and operationalize abstract concepts and arguments all the while demonstrating their practical application and always going the extra mile for his students.

He graduated last year from École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales and holds an M.A. in economic sociology. Unsurprisingly he graduated with the highest honors. He wrote his MA Thesis with Frédéric Lordon while criticizing his epistemology. His thesis is a great piece of work, demonstrating remarkable analytical skills and undeniable academic excellence; compared to his peers, Adrien is certainly among the top 2% of our students.

Adrien would be a perfect catch for your program. He has been awarded several scholarships to spend time in the US at NYU as well as in Taiwan at the Institute of political science of Academia Sinica. He is quick, trained in qualitative and quantitative methods, in addition to being a talented writer, in both French and English.

I have no doubt he will be a tremendous asset for the ULB.

For all these reasons, I recommend him very warmly and without hesitation.
